

Sometimes knowledge is beyond us

When the intellectual mind reaches its limit, transcendental intelligence comes into play. In other words, when we go beyond our ability to reason everything out mathematically, or by a set formula, we then have the ability to enter into a transcendental field of thought.

It is time to leave the world of reason behind. Sometimes your mind is filled with too many thoughts and you become confused. You want to become one with your performance. Go with the flow so to speak. Your actions must be based upon the wisdom of knowledge applied. Everything comes down to application and not thought.

In this realm, you can become one with the fragments of your ability. These are the parts you can not articulate. You need to become the observer and not the thinker.

It was your level of performance that separated you from other gifted players. You knew how to let it happen. If you think about the conditions of your match and who you are playing, where you are on the charts, what the score is, you would engage in a futile exercise of intellection evaluation. It would call for mental stress. You need to go beyond that. You will want to exhaust all limits within the intellectual mind and enter the strong clouds of transcendental intelligence and then ride this to a better performance.

As long as you are doing mental gymnastics you can not enter the transcendental field of performance. There is no conscious thought when you drive your cue tip through the cue ball. You need to be free because a single thought will divert the arrow from its course.

Once you go beyond intellect, you must trust yourself to enter the realm of deeper thought or no thought. The intellectual mind is limited by your capacity to differentiate between rational and irrational thought. In order to go beyond intellectual thought, you must be willing to turn your thinking over to the care of the Universal Mind. You must be able to link up with the Universal Mind.

Only the great masters of our time are able to do this. Monks and deep spiritual thinkers can enter this harmonic world called nirvana. In this world, you cannot bring intellectual strife. You must be free.
